

This transcript was exported on Dec 05, 2021 - view latest version here.

Speaker 1:

Two big plays and We're back to neutral. Tannehill going deep. Hartline all alone. Touchdown! Brian Hartline.

Kimberly Lohman Clapp:

I'm super excited to talk to you about this game changer, game changer in technology, this cool company and app called Kazoo and their SOS feature. What was the thing you heard that said, this is something I'd like to have, I'd like my family to have, I'd like my community to have.

Brian Hartline:

The biggest thing that draws me to anything is just trying to be on the proactive side of anything, trying to be able to anticipate and to mitigate versus react post situation. So the ability with Kazoo is to have a live stream SOS. So with the temperament of culture now and those that feel vulnerable, those that feel like I wish people could see what's going on. To me, it was always trying to find ways to prevent instead of react. And I think that Kazoo does that.

Kimberly Lohman Clapp:

You mentor young men from many different backgrounds and it sounds like you see potential for this really helping them.

Brian Hartline:

Yeah. I think that to try to understand how others feel I think is not always fair. You're not in their shoes, you haven't had their experiences. So what they may find is SOS may not be is what you find. So giving people the ability to remove all doubt and kind of get to their problem quickly, besides deciding whether I should call or not call and really try to dissolve a situation. What else? Like what can we put in people's hands in that time to help. And we're sitting here talking about Kazoo.